By one estimate, a car-free cyclist overpays by an average of $250 a year — a few dollars more than the amount an average driver underpays. While cyclists represent all income levels more or less equally, the ones who ride for transportation alone and don't own cars are on the lower end of the income spectrum.

A bicycle with tough, knobby tires is often the only way to get around the city. These are times when the latent demand for bicycling makes itself known.” — Elly Blue, Bikenomics: How Bicycling Can Save The Economy

BIKENOMICS

Blue's Bikenomics begins with a preface explaining that the "economy" of her subtitle is not as limiting as it might seem. She argues that "there are really two economic cases for bicycling": the first is the obvious one, that it contributes to growth; the second is the more radical one, that it offers people the option to "opt out of the cost of car ownership or reliance on largely dismantled transit systems", as well as connecting and strengthening communities.
