A "grammar" specifies which trees can represent the structure of a given text. Each of these trees is called a "parse tree" for the text (or simply a "parse"). In a "context free" grammar, the set of parse trees for any piece of a text can depend only on that piece, and not on the rest of the text (i.e., the piece's context).

All the matched rules are stored in a tree. The bottom nodes in a path have higher priority. The tree contains all the paths for rule matches that were found. Storing the rules is done lazily. The tree isn't calculated at the beginning for every node, but whenever a node style needs to be computed the computed paths are added to the tree.
